With appreciation to the United Jewish Endowment Fund for funding this study
As we look forward to the next 10 years, our community must make important decisions in the areas of planning, services and funding.

The Jewish Federation of Greater Washington’s 2014 study of our metro DC area Jewish community asks what individuals are looking for in Jewish programs and services and provides insights into their feelings about community. The study focuses on attitudinal and psychographic information rather than demographics.

Conducted by The Mellman Group, researchers spoke with one thousand Jewish residents from the Greater Washington area and spent up to twenty minutes on the phone with each, delving into their perceptions of the community and the programs and services they feel are most relevant to their families and themselves. Highlights of the findings are included in this pamphlet. The full study results can be found at shalomdc.org.
KEY TAKEAWAYS from the study:

89% SAY THAT BEING JEWISH IS IMPORTANT
Identifying as Jewish is important for almost all respondents. Those who attend synagogue most frequently see participation in Jewish activities as a priority. For 32% of those surveyed, taking part in Jewish activities is not a priority.

67% FEEL CONNECTED TO THE GREATER WASHINGTON JEWISH COMMUNITY
67% of those surveyed say that they feel a connection to the Greater Washington Jewish community. The highest feelings of connection are among married couples with children at home and those who have Jewish spouses. Those in interfaith relationships and those who rarely attend religious services say they do not feel very connected.

81% SEE THE GREATER WASHINGTON JEWISH COMMUNITY AS WELCOMING
87% of respondents see the Greater Washington Jewish community as providing a good environment for families. 81% view the community as welcoming. However, this does not directly correlate to interest in participating in Jewish communal activities.

50%+ SAID SHARED VALUES DRIVE THEIR PARTICIPATION IN THE JEWISH COMMUNITY
Most (82%) say that being part of a community with shared values is a key driver. Community members report that they seek activities and people who share their values. Over 50% of those surveyed cite “shared values” as the reason why they want to participate in the Jewish community.

WHO BELONGS TO A SYNAGOGUE?
90% Orthodox
60% Conservative
50% Reform & Reconstructionist
90% of those who identify as Orthodox report belonging to a synagogue; 60% of those who self-identify as Conservative; and almost 50% of the Reform and Reconstructionist Jews report belonging to a synagogue. 87% of those who self-identify as Orthodox report going to synagogue at least once a month; 39% of Conservative Jews go at least once a month; and 29% of Reform and Reconstructionist Jews report going at least once a month.
40% FEEL STRONGLY CONNECTED TO ISRAEL
40% of those surveyed report feeling a strong/deep connection to Israel while 27% feel almost no connection.

30% DONATE PREDOMINANTLY TO JEWISH CAUSES
30% of those surveyed report that they give more than 50% of their charitable contributions to Jewish causes; 34% give up to 50%, and 20% say they do not give to Jewish organizations.

PROGRAMS THE COMMUNITY WOULD LIKE TO SEE MORE OF:
- 50% Volunteering
- 42% Social programs
- 38% Cultural activities
- 35% Programs on Jewish history
- 34% Programs on Israel

OTHER TAKEAWAYS
- Among those most involved in the community, cost and geography are not cited as strong deterrents to participation. However, among those who are least involved, these issues are cited as reasons for non-participation.
- Of those who are least involved in the community, very few current program offerings are seen as appealing. 27% report that they are likely to participate in “volunteering to help the homeless and other service projects”; 13% say “exercise programs” and 12% say “activities for senior citizens.”
- While many feel that the local Jewish community is too expensive and too far away, these are not key deterrents to involvement. Among those that identified these issues, most make their Jewish community participation decisions based on interest factors.
- According to interfaith couples with children, 41% are raising their children solely as Jews; 13% are raising them another faith; 20% are raising them in both religions and 25% as neither. According to the Jewish spouse interviewed, 70% of non-Jewish spouses feel welcomed by the community, but only 16% say they would likely participate in a program for interfaith families.
